

Frameboxx ties up with Anglia Ruskin University

Frameboxx Animation & Visual Effects, a versatile conglomerate offering pioneering services in animation and visual effects training has received accreditation of its courses with the prestigious Anglia Ruskin University and its Cambridge School of Art.

This was announced in Chandigarh on 12th June at a press meet, by Frameboxx founders, Rajesh Turakhia, Managing Director and Naveen Gupta, Executive Director & CEO, along with Caroline Hyde, Business Development Manager for Cultural & Creative Industries from Anglia Ruskin University, accompanied by Chris Joyce and Jim Butler, senior members from the Cambridge School of Art, who are on a tour of India visiting Frameboxx training facilities across the country.

'The students of Frameboxx Animation and Visual Effects undergoing RedBoxx2 programme shall now receive 120 undergraduate credits from Anglia Ruskin University that can help them pursue further graduate studies abroad', informed Rajesh Turakhia, Managing Director, Frameboxx, which has 40 state-of-the-art academic centres across the country as of today.

Caroline Hyde, informed that Redboxx2 programme offered by Frameboxx has been given the seal of approval after a comprehensive audit and evaluation of their course material, delivery and assessment procedures, and the faculty's expertise.

The seal of approval from Anglia Ruskin University not only ensures quality of Frameboxx training programmes which meets international quality standards, but offers immense opportunities to the local animators for global jobs as well as for pursuing further education abroad, added Caroline.

Caroline expressing her delight on behalf of Anglia Ruskin University said that Frameboxx is a highly professional organisation and is uniquely positioned to provide the skilled and talented animators through its portfolio of highly credible programmes to fuel the growth of this industry in India.

The students who meet the assessment criteria and pass their award will receive the certificate of completion bearing the seal of Anglia Ruskin University giving them a distinct edge, informed Naveen Gupta, Executive Director, Frameboxx.

Frameboxx has always delivered beyond the industry's expectations and the validation of our programmes has once again reinforced our quality benchmarks, Naveen said.

Frameboxx would be working closely with Anglia Ruskin University to further elevate the standards of training and curriculum as well as initiate exchange programmes and other initiatives for the benefits of Indian animators, Naveen Gupta informed.

Frameboxx offers a wide array of courses featuring skill set specialization at its core coupled with industry internships at its unique incubation facility in Mumbai.

Founded in 1858 by John Ruskin, the Cambridge School of Art is a department of Anglia Ruskin University - one of the largest universities in the UK. The University provides education for over 28,000 students across two main campuses in Cambridge and Chelmsford and at partner regional colleges in the UK and across the world. Courses range from undergraduate through to professional qualifications and research degrees.

Frameboxx was set up in December 2007 by two evangelists of the animation world, Rajesh Turakhia and Naveen Gupta, which today has expanded to 40 centres of excellence in animation and visual effects training in the country today.

(© India PRwire / India eNews)