

British bands are stealing our sound: Gallagher

Rocker Noel Gallagher is slamming the present batch of British bands for not having original talent and claims that they are riding on the success of his band Oasis' debut album 'Definitely Maybe'.

According to contactmusic.com, Gallagher particularly pointed out The Libertines, Arctic Monkeys, The Kooks and Razorlight for copying the Oasis sound.

He says: 'If I see one more advert on the TV for an album that says 'Best guitar album since Definitely Maybe' I'll shoot whoever writes those fking things. It's flattering that it's still considered the benchmark, and that The Libertines, Arctic Monkeys, Razorlight and all said it was the album for them, but come on.

'I think a lot of these bands are just copying the blueprint. You're always looking at Johnny Borrell (Razorlight frontman) or him out of The Kooks and going 'I dunno if you mean it man'. When you see those bands, there's something not quite right.'

(© IANS / India eNews)